PREFACE

A new brush sweeps clean, but an old brush knows the corners...

Punitive damages: real plum or recipe for disaster?

Punitive damages are traditionally not awarded in Continental European legal systems. There, punishment is an exclusive power of the government that should stay part of the public law domain. The strong European view is that punitive damages should in no way be utilised to protect private law interests. Compensating the victim for his or her loss is the objective of tort law. ‘American situations’, especially the awarding of exorbitant amounts of punitive damages, are feared and should in the opinion of most European scholars by all means be avoided. However, since the strict difference between public and private law seems to be fading, new opportunities are created and old axioms are being reconsidered. European legal scholars have explored the American concept of punitive damages as a way to strengthen tort law and as a new means of private enforcement. For this reason, in November 2010 the Ius Commune Research School on its annual conference devoted the Liability and Insurance workshop to ‘the Power of Punitive Damages’ and the function that this legal remedy could serve in Europe. This book does not merely include the papers of the speakers but also other papers written in the aftermath thereof.

The book starts with an introduction into the punitive damages debate, with reference to general aspects of American punitive damages law, explanations for the absence of punitive damages in Continental Europe, and causes for the growing European interest in punitive damages (Lotte Meurkens). Further analyses of American punitive damages law are contained in the first part of this book, including four contributions by the American authors Jim Gash, Mark Geistfeld, David Owen and Anthony Sebok. This first part also includes contributions relating to the common law systems Australia (Danuta Mendelson) and England (Jonathan Morgan), as well as the mixed legal system Cyprus (Sofia Michaelides-Mateou). The second part goes into the European punitive damages debate, including contributions of Evelien de Kezel for Belgian law, Ulrich Magnus for German law, Chantal Mahé for French law, Marta Otero Crespo for Spanish law, Marta Requejo Isidro for the private international law perspective of punitive damages and Cedric Vanleenhove for European law. The third and final part contains contributions relating to punitive damages and special themes, to be precise human rights (Vanessa Wilcox), enforcement in family law (Sara Matthé), insurability (Emily Nordin and Daily Wuyts), bad faith insurers (Lodewijk Smeehuijzen), contract law (Robert Hardy), law and economics (Louis Visscher) and enforcement of EC competition law (Angela Ortega González).

In short, this book tries to promote a better understanding of the different approaches towards punishment in private law, and will give new perspectives on punitive damages.

The editors would like to thank Gerrit van Maanen for giving two young researchers the opportunity to edit this book, and Ton Hartlief, David Owen and Aloïs Van Oevelen for their advice. Our thanks also go out to the authors, whose book this is.
